The Leonard House, an antiquated structure, stood near the forge, a little more than a mile from Fowling Pond, on the residence. A friendly intercourse subsisted between this family and the warrior of Mount Hope, and from the iron works he obtained instruments for use in peace gave orders that the Leonard family should not be molested. The house was however, garrisoned, and two young women were there killed by the savages, and buried be-The head of Philip was for some time

EXTRAORDINARY RESUSCITATION

A Paris paper tells this strange story : A religious custom has just prevented a person from being buried alive, and, singular to relate this is the second time the same thing has happened to the same person.

About ten years ago, Eulalie B——, then aged three years, daughter of respectable tradespeople in Rue Montmorency, was attacked with typus fever. After a fortnight's sickness she appeared to expire, night's sickness she appeared to expire, night's sickuess she appeared to expire, Sunda and her parents, as a relief to their sorrow, left the house, leaving two of the girl's sants to superintend the funeral. As the family belonged to the reformed religion, it was resolved, in compliance with the name custom, to wash the body before placing it in the shrond. While the water was warming, one of the aunis proposed that it should be made quite hot and that tart of the foot of the deceased should be females, to their surprise, funcied that they heard a little sigh. They thereupon began to employ friction on different parts of the body, and succeeded in restoring the child back to life.
